This workshop calls for papers that explore the new trends of Chinese migrations within Southeast Asia, and the intermixing of new Chinese migrants and the existing Chinese settler communities that have been there for generations. It adopts a broader sense of Chinese migrations. It also looks into the newest impacts that the pandemic has had on people's perceptions about mobility and migration strategies. We address the following questions:

1. What are the major drivers of new migrations into the region and how do local Chinese communities perceive the incoming of the different categories of new Chinese migrants?
2. What impacts do these new migrants and new capital have on local developments?
3. How have the pandemic and pandemic-induced policies affected the movements of Chinese people and capital?
4. How do local regulations of the destination countries affect migration processes, post-migration life plans, and migrants' capital movement?
5. How are the new Chinese capital and migration movements reshaping Chinese–Southeast Asian relations, the social and cultural dynamics at their destinations, and the ethnic geographies of the overseas Chinese communities?
6. In what ways has the pandemic and pandemic induced governance reshaped Chinese mobility?
